South American Countries Hint At Price War in Export Coffee

The coffee drinker is entitled to raise a steaming cup of coffee and toast his latest victory. The price of coffee at retail is down.

But while the customer basks in mild self-congratulation, he still may find it difficult to figure exactly what did happen. The story is an intricate one:

For some months now, Brazil has been passing the price of coffee at 87 cents a pound at dockside. More recently Colombia has been sniping at Brazil's big U. S. market with discounts of 2 to 4 cents a pound on competing grades.

Two weeks ago the Brazilians decided to do something about this. Coffee yields three-fourths of Brazil's foreign exchange, and it can't do so sitting in a Santos warehouse. However, the coffee price peg is as popular as high support prices in the United States, so any price cut had to be subtle.

Fortunately there was a gimmick at hand. While the official price of the Brazilian cruzeiro is 18 to the dollar, plenty of Brazilians would rather have one dollar than 60 cruzeiros. The Bank of Brazil relaxed its rules, let more of this free exchange be used to buy coffee. The grower still got the same number of cruzeiros, but they cost the buyer much less than 87 cents.

Colombian growers are rushing their coffee into the government pool at the older price—now above Brazil's—so it seems they expect a price cut, too.

ATOMS GO TO SCHOOL — More than 50 colleges and universities across the nation now have cyclotrons—"atom smashers"—to help their students delve into the mysteries of the atom. One college, North Carolina State, even has an atomic furnace.

Even before the passage of the act which opens atomic development to private firms, hopes for the spread of peace-time application of nuclear energy had attracted many young physicists and engineers into the atomic energy field.

George M. Muschamp, vice-president for engineering of the Industrial Division of Minneapolis-Honeywell Regulator Company, maker of many of the measuring and controlling devices which monitor these college-based cyclotrons and the Carolina reactor, made a study of the uses to which atomic research is being put. So far it runs into the hundreds, ranging from preserving food for long periods to tracing disease-caused changes in human bodies.

THINGS TO COME—Meant for the milder winters we've been saving, a lightweight snowsuit is made of nylon with Dacron insulation. Shopping cart sets, a real one for mother and a toy one for daughter, come with dummy packages in the junior carrier. . . . A new necktie, called the Cape Coddler, is trimmed with real fishing flies.

A six-inch plastic scale model of the White House will be offered the Christmas toy trade. . . . A portable pocket-sized lock can be purchased to fasten hotel or motel closets, bureau drawers and other places the traveler might want secure.

FREIGHT RATES FALL — Eastern railroads have received approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission for their first overall reduction of less-than-carload-lot freight rates since World War II. The reductions apply to the whole Eastern territory, and affect all shipments.

Rome Cable Employees Turn Down Union Offer — Production workers at Rome Cable Corporation's Rome, New York, plant defeated by a margin of nearly 5 to 1 a petition by the International Association of Machinists, A. F. L., to serve as their bargaining agent. These employees have not been affiliated with any union. The election was conducted Aug. 26 by Edward H. Noonan, examiner of the National Labor Relations Board.

A similar petition by the same union was defeated last April 7th at the Company's Torrance plant.

Valuables Stolen — Someone broke into his car and stole money and valuables totaling $790 while he was swimming at Torrance Beach yesterday afternoon, Paul N. Hanover of Inglewood, told police.
